Unfortunately, Lawrences health was not permanently improved, and, returning to Virginia, he died there the following summer. His Mount Vernon estate was left to his only daughter, but she outlived her father only two years, the property then passing to George. It was in this way that Washington became the owner of the home he so dearly loved, and which is to-day the shrine of all patriotic Americans. After the stirring events of Braddocks campaign against the French and Indians, and his defeat at Fort Duquesne in 1755, Colonel Washington, now twenty-four years old and the commander of the Virginia militia, was given permission by Governor Dinwiddie to journey to Boston, in order to settle a question of rank with Governor Shirley of Massachusetts. Washington, in gold-laced hat and cloak, with the family crest on his saddle-cloth, set out...
