Malagola, Statuti delle Universita e dei Collegi dello Studio Bolognese, 488, and note 3. Aristotle, the fourth book of the Topics of Boethius and the Nova Rhetorica of Cicero (probably ad Herennium) were read.11 There can remain no doubt that the study of formal rhetoric did not flourish at the universities even as much as it had done in the best schools of the early Middle Ages. But there was one phase of rhetoric which was developed in a remarkable way at the universities. The art of writing well and ornately had always constituted a part of rhetoric although the Roman manuals had naturally subordinated it to the art of speaking. Although orators did not flourish in the Middle Ages there were better opportunities for a man skillful in the use of the pen, that is, one who could write correctly letters and other important documents. Now throughout the earlier...
